Solution Brief

A huge unknown

New IDC and RSA research shows that there's a lot of uncertainty about the nature and scale of the risk that employees pose to business systems and information: 'insider risk' is a huge unknown for most organizations.

How confident are you that you're doing enough to address this significant area of vulnerability?

What you're not seeing

Do you associate internal risk with the actions of a few malicious or compromised individuals? Do you believe that dealing with it would require restrictive security measures that would jeopardize productivity and employee trust?

Our research and our years of experience with thousands of organizations tell a different story:

- Internally, you're more at risk from unintentional activity than deliberate attack
- IDC found that in the last 12 months the US respondents admitted to having a total of 20,565 insider risks and all respondents across the four EMEA regions admitted to 58,000 risks!
- Most insider risk is readily controllable - without inconveniencing employees or compromising operational effectiveness
